PROJECT FINGER GUN

Division: Aspexx Weapons Research and Development

Project Leads: Brook, Shady & Brook, Babbling

A revolutionary design for a covert personal weapon system, ideal for undercover law enforcement and close protection. The system uses an energy accumulator surgically implanted into the subject's forearm which generates energy from the body's own biological processes with a charging time comparable to traditional energy weapons. By splicing the mechanism into the nervous system, the subject is able to control the weapon through neural impulses, triggering the accumulator to focus energy along the finger into a charged particle beam capable of damaging a target. The weapon is resistant to detection by standard scanning technology, though it may be registered by more intensive scans. This product is currently in the closed alpha phase and all information regarding its development is considered to be a trade secret of the Aspexx Corporation.
